Insulin suppresses 4E-BP1 and eIF4E phosphorylation and impairs cap-dependent translation initiation during adipogenesis. Previously we have reported that insulin inhibits C2C12 differentiation and maturation via the phosphatidylinositol 3-kinase/Akt pathway and decreases the protein level of PPARgamma. In this study, the effects of insulin on cap-dependent translation initiation and the subsequent phosphorylation of eukaryotic initiation factor 4E (eIF4E) and 4E-binding protein 1 (4E-BP1) during adipogenesis were investigated. Insulin suppressed the phosphorylation of 4E-BP1 and increased the expression levels of eIF4E, 4E-BP1, and RNA polymerase II, which are involved in cap-dependent translation initiation. 4E-BP1 expression in C2C12 cells that overexpressed PDK1 and was differentiated in the absence of insulin was significantly decreased, which is associated with the downregulation of the PI3K-Akt pathway. In contrast, insulin suppressed the phosphorylation of PDK1, Akt, and S6K during C2C12 differentiation. Also, the total protein levels of eIF4E and 4E-BP1 were decreased during adipogenesis. In conclusion, insulin suppresses cap-dependent translation initiation during adipogenesis through the PI3K-Akt pathway.
