Law enforcement officers are frustrated with mandatory minimum sentences, which can be unwieldy and may be set too low to adequately address violent crimes, according to a national poll of officers. A new national poll of more than 3,000 officers shows that only 25 percent supported more mandatory minimum sentences for violent crimes, while 67 percent supported more time served in prison before release, according to the National Association of Police Organizations. ADVERTISEMENT While police support increasing prison time as a solution to violent crimes, with 75 percent supporting more time served for those convicted of violent crimes, not everyone supports the building of new prisons. Two-thirds of officers support reducing the number of inmates. Twenty percent of police support abolishing prisons entirely. Poll: Co-sponsors of controversial Graham-Cassidy bill "should be prepared for a 'hellacious' backlash from the public," a top Senate Republican strategist told Axios. "Our polling shows that Americans share our concerns about the skyrocketing national incarceration rate and the billions of taxpayer dollars now spent on incarcerating people who are often better off behind bars," NAPO executive director Fredric Johnson said in a statement. "The public is ready for Congress to address these issues. The sooner the better." Johnson said the poll was taken to see what is "the public's basic opinion about the most popular proposals for reforming our criminal justice system."
