Therefore, we may conclude that biofilm formation ability on the gingival surfaces of different individuals is not similar, and that different individuals may have a different ability to form biofilms on their gingival tissues. It was also interesting to note the biofilm formation ability was observed within 24 hours of incubation, but it was not very persistent. After 72 hours, bacterial growth returned to its original level in the control and salivary-conditioned media. This indicates that the bacterial growth ability in the gingival sulcus was not high enough to maintain biofilm formation over a longer period of time. It was also speculated that the gingival sulcus was too small and the amount of salivary secretions was not adequate to support bacterial growth. The stimulation of salivary flow was performed twice per day for 4 days, and the mean stimulated salivary flow was 10.19 ± 3.62 mL/min. This was lower than the salivary flow measured in an individual \[[@pone.0172723.ref043]\]. Furthermore, people with low salivary flow have a higher risk of dental caries \[[@pone.0172723.ref044]\]. It was speculated that low salivary flow in individuals with low biofilm formation ability caused, not
