Mining should lead to solar power in Africa Shares Africa's first-ever solar summit in Swaziland, which drew more than 200 participants from across the continent, has signalled a massive shift in thinking about solar energy. It may be that solar power is the most suitable way for a small, resource-poor country to power itself, but the question remains: why should other countries invest in it? The summit also involved much less-traditional collaboration, including between local scientists and energy companies. The main purpose was to highlight the amount of solar energy falling on the continent and the potential it has for it to become independent of Western aid. The summit was opened by South Africa's minister of energy, Jonathan Zondo, and Swaziland's minister of energy, Matjila Mapocha, who said that Swaziland was investing in oil, to the detriment of the country's environment. But he added that what the country really needed was a source of renewable energy. The summit suggested that there's a ready market for solar energy and the potential to develop it, both on the continent and on a global level. The summit was one of the first occasions where African countries realised they needed to make solar power a priority, and that it would be a better investment than the current reliance on petroleum for energy. The summit was hosted by Swaziland's minister of energy, Nkaly Dlamini, in partnership with the African Renewable Energy Forum. Swaziland is the second-largest economy in Africa, with only Gabon with a larger economy, according to the World Bank. However, its main export is natural resources, such as diamonds, coal and gum. By increasing the capacity of local solar power networks, Swaziland will be able to reduce its dependence on imported energy. Dlamini explained the benefits of low-carbon energy. He said: "We are not going to have a society where everybody is going to pick up their private car and move out to a non-carbonised future. "[There's a] need to rely on zero-carbon, and renewable energies." Government leaders attending the summit said it was a chance for them to be exposed to different kinds of renewable technologies. "If all of us feel [that

's status for purposes of the immigration laws and requirements of INS regulations. See Rohit, 183 F.3d at 143 (concluding that court need not delay removal by granting withholding of removal). The IJ considered Chang's petition and issued an opinion and order on October 7, 2003, in which the IJ denied relief. The IJ issued an oral decision and order on February 10, 2004, again denying relief. Chang filed a notice of appeal with the BIA on February 27, 2004. The BIA adopted and affirmed the IJ's decision without opinion on November 30, 2004. Chang has not filed a petition for review. On appeal, Chang challenges the IJ's and BIA's conclusion that she is removable under INA § 237(a)(2)(A)(iii) because she was convicted of an aggravated felony. Specifically, Chang argues that the 2003 Amendments to the INA superceded the INA § 212(c) waiver and that her convictions for aiding and abetting the unlawful possession of firearms under Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-308.2(A) and the burglary statute, Va. Code Ann. § 18.2-89, do not qualify as aggravated felonies. Chang claims that she should be afforded the chance to apply for a waiver. She seeks withholding of removal under INA § 241(b)(3) and the Convention
