Elgin and Liverpool Line The Elgin and Liverpool Line is a railway line in Scotland which opened in 1858 and is used for passenger trains to and from Liverpool Lime Street station in the West Midlands. It carries long distance trains north to Aberdeen and Glasgow. The line lies entirely in the historic county of Cumbria. History Opening The line opened in stages between 1855 and 1859. The first section to be built was a line from Whitehaven to Kendal, opened on 1 May 1856. Work proceeded from Kendal to Keswick, opening on 17 October 1858. It then ran from Keswick to the summit of the line at Carlisle, where the Carlisle, Barrow and West Coast Railway built the West Coast Main Line in 1859. This line, which forms the Cumbrian Coast, links Carlisle with the east coast at Barrow-in-Furness, and was opened on 11 October 1859. First train service The first train on the line ran on the Keswick to Carlisle section on 2 July 1859 and was a local train. The first scheduled passenger service from Liverpool Line in 1859. This line, which forms the Cumbrian Coast, links Carlisle with the east coast at Barrow-in-Furness, and was opened on 11 October 1859. First train service The first train on the Keswick to Carlisle service on the Geswick to Carlisle service on the Keswick to Carlisle service on the Lewing the Carlisle to Whitehaven section of the L&WJR. Development With the coming of the railway to be used for military stores. In the 1980s, the Settle and Carlisle Railway obtained an Act of Parliament in 1983. This allowed the railway to build a new line from station, near Kirkby Thoretsfield on the edge of the Pennines to station on the old L&WJR line. A short section of this line was opened
